"The Husking." By J. G. WHITTIER.

It was the pleasant harvest time, When cellar bins are closely stowed, And garrets bend beneath their load, And the old swallow-haunted barns,-Brown-gabled, long, and full of seams Through which the mounted smalight streams,

And winds blow freshly in to shake The red plames of the roosted cocks, And the locae hay-mow's scented locks Are filled with Summer's ripened stores,

Its odorous grass and barley sheaves, From their low scaffold to their eaves. On Esek Harden's oaken floor, With many an Autumn's threshing worn, Lay the heaped ears of unshaken corn.

And thither came young men and maids, Beneath a moon that, large and low, Lit that sweet eve of long ago. They took their places; some by chance,

And others by a merry voice Or aweet smile guided to their choice. How pleasantly the rising moon,

Between the shadows of the mows
Looked on them through the greatelm boughs

Oh sturdy boyhood, sun-embrowned, On girlhood, with its solid curves Of healthful strength and painless nerves. And lests went round, and laughs that made

The house-dog answer with his howl, And keep awake the barn-yard fowl; And quaint old songs their fathers sung In Derby dales and Yorkshire moors, Ere Norman William trod their shores.

And tales, whose merry license shock The fat sides of the Saxon thane, Forgetful of the hovering Dane— Rude plays to Celt and Cimbri known, The charms and riddles that beguiled On Oxns' banks the young world's child—

That primal picture speech wherein Have youth and maid the story told So new in each, so dateless old. Recalling pastoral Ruth in her Who waited blushing and demure, The reader's kiss of forfeiture.

Details of the Capture of Lima.

Correspondence of the People and Patriot. The battles, if such they may be called, began with an attack made at dawn of Thursday, January 13th, on the right centre of the Peruvian line which occupied the heights of San Juan, and was made by Col. Lynch, his own line being nearly in front of the Peruvian right and extending from Mono Solar to San Juan.

General Sotomayor, with the second division, and Col. Tayos, with the third, formed the centre and right of the Chilian line, but arrived somewhat later and after Lynch's division was well engaged. The fight lasted till about 7 a.m., when the Peruvian line was completely broken and their position at San Juan captured. But it still continued towards the extreme right. the batteries on the hills, and the troops in Chorrillos resisting, and a fierce charge was made on those positions, which were taken about noon, with heavy loss on both sides, the remnant of the Peruvian troops, cut off by the capture of Barranco, escaping by the beach to Miraflores, which henceforth became the Peruvian right.

Sr. Pierola narrowly escaped capture. His aides dispersed, and only two foreign officers accompanied him. The panic in Lima was extreme, and only allayed by official telegrams from the front, announcing that the positions at San Juan had been recaptured (which of course, was utterly un-moralizing the whole army. The carnage house where I, of course, passed another in Chorrillos is described as fearful. The sol-sleepless night. diery, maddened at being fired at from windows and housetops, could not be restrained, and not a single house remains of all the beautiful ranchos; all were fired and destroyed either that day or the next.

The wounded began to arrive in great numbers, and were conveyed at once in stretchers to the Exhibition building, converted into a temporary hospital. In this task, foreigners almost exclusively occupied themselves; the self-elected members of the red cross organizations, who had swarmed on the streets by thousands during the last few days, looking on in gratified idleness. They were too lazy or too hightoned to do guard duty over the city, which they turned over to the protection of the foreigners, and were now too dainty to succor their own wounded. This task was left to the very men still smarting under the sense of unjustice from outrageous fines of two days before, and they performed it heartily and well.

Stragglers poured into the city, some singly, some in groups of a hundred or two. They were, as far as possible, gathered in and at nightfall some two or three thousand of them sent to the front; but a vague sense of uneasiness stole over the city, and the legations and consulates began to be crowded with refugees fearing the plundering instincts of these hungry deserters.

The night passed, however, in compara-tive quiet, and Friday dawned on a sleepless city, awaiting in breathless expectancy, they scarcely knew what; but foreseeing disaster from either side. On Saturday, the 15th, a Committee of the Diplomatic Corps went to Gen. Baquedano, Commander-in-chief of the Chilian forces, asking that he give guarantee for the security of foreign life and property in case the city were captured, and also asking that a truce be granted to enable them to present his terms to President Pierola.

They returned, having partly accomplished their mission, and then the Ministers of the United States, France, Germany, England, Italy, Spain, Salvador and the British and French Admirals, with the Captains of some of the men-of-war, went together to Sr. Pierola's head-quarters at Miraflores, to lay before him the terms offered by General Baquedano, and to take back his answer to the Chilian head-quarters at Chorrillos. A truce had been arranged and General Baquedano had not only promised not to open fire until midnight, but had given orders that any man in his lines opening fire, should be shot down. (This I heard from his own lips.) He had reserved the right to alter the position of some of his artillery and had done this to his satisfaction, and was coolly riding back to his own lines, confident in the sacredness of an armistice and in the good faith of those who had allowed the diplomats to come to him in the interests of peace. This was at 2:20 P.M. The Diplomatic body had arrived at Miraflores, passed through the lines on the extreme Peruvian right and reached Pierola's head-quarters at Schell's house, where he was breakfasting. While waiting for him was breakfasting. While waiting for him to finish, to present to him the terms they had brought from Gen. Baquedano and which I am creditably informed, were honorable propositions, such as Chili might offer and Peru accept without dishonor, the deep thunder of a single gun from the Peruvian right was heard, followed, after an interval of a few seconds, by the long, rolling sound of a thousand rifles, the crash of battery after battery of field pieces and the occasional pounding of heavier artil-The Chilian army, taken by surprise, faltered a moment, and then, forming as steadily as if on parade, advanced on the works at Miraflores. The regulars wavered and fled, but the reserve held firm in their trenches and poured a withering fire into the ranks of the advancing Chilians. Gen, Baquedano, who was but a few hundred yards in front of the works, when the treacherous fire was opened, had his horse wounded under him; but otherwise escaped injury. There was "mounting in hot haste" as the hail of lead pattered into Miraflores and the Krupp shell plowed up the ground. The distinguished party gathered in conclave at Mr. Schell's bouse, scattered like chaff before the wind. Some, in their haste, became involved in the maze of streets and could find no outlet; others lost coat and hat in crowding through crevices in adobe walls, and all had to wade knee-deep through sundry watercourses with shot and shell screaming and bedragged. The firing was, of course, heard in the capital long before, and soon the rumor flew that the Diplomatic corps had been fired on, the French Minister killed, the English, mortally wounded, the United States and German, badly hurt. I gave it little credit, having had some experience in rumors lately; but when I saw a horseman approach the German legation, bearing the sensible form of the German Minister before him on the saddle, I must confess I was staggered.

I went at once to the British legation, and soon satisfied myself of the facts. The German Minister had fallen and burt himself, but was otherwise uninjured, the others unburt. Towards sunset, many officers arrived from the front, all stating that the Chilians had been driven back. A small extra was published stating the same news, but still I was incredulous. At half-past six, I saw and heard firing from the batteries on the top of San Bartolme, near the extreme left of the Peruvian line. I at once surmised that the reports hitherto received were suspicious and the rapid filling of the streets with armed stragglers was only confirmatory of the conjectures. At about 4 P.M., the next day, Sunday, the 16th, Captain Astete, Prefect of Callao, arrived with some twelve or fifteen hundred men and marched around the city, trying | 2 to draw the stragglers into his ranks, with but partial success, for by nightfull they all abandoned him and either straggled back to Callao or wandered about the streets, firing their rifles and only adding to the go to the legation at 7 P.M.; but the firing in the plaza was so heavy and continuous that I thought my first duty was to those The Peruvian regulars are said to have | who had sought refuge under my flag and, behaved very badly, dispersing and de- at some risk, succeeded in regaining my

> On Sunday, the 16th, the full truth became known. The Chilian troops had carried Miraflores and its defences at the point of the bayonet. The army of Peru was disbanded. The supreme chief had fled with a handful of followers. The remnants of the reserves were told to go to their homes, and the victorious General was awaiting within a league of the city to know under what terms he could enter it. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Don Pedro Jose Calderon, with the rest of the Cabinet, had fled, and there was no government left save that of Don Rafael Torrico, Alcalde of the city, and his jurisdiction extended no further than the gates of Lima. He knew, as did we all, that for the Chilian troops to enter then would be to risk the insane folly of some ignorant straggler who might, by a shot in bravado, draw down the destructive vengeance of ten thousand men, fresh from the fields of Tarapaea, Tacna and Arica, upon the innocent city of Lima. The day drew slowly to its close, anxiety upon every face and dread in every heart. was known that hundreds of hungry soldiers were roaming about the streets withont food or money, and in the afternoon sundry provision stores of the Chinese in the low quarter had already been sacked by the mob. There was no police, no authority to whom to appeal. The foreign guard had been violently disbanded and had become so scattered that it would have been extremely difficult to get them together for concerted action, and darkness settled over the capital, while every sense was overstrained in expectation of some dire catastrophe, since the conquering army awaited at our gates, and within we were at the mercy of

As the night wore on, the ruffianly element crept from its lairs, eager for plunder. The deserted streets offered tempting bribes to the hungry and desperate and, while the night was yet young, a preconcerted onslaught seemed to be made on the humble shops or costlier warehouses of the unfortunate Chinese. The district around the market afforded a wide field for villainy, and soon the skies were crimson with the flames as shop after shop was battered in with the rfle butts, the terrified owners bayoneted or shot down and the loot secured. Nor was this the only district attacked; opposite the bank of Peru, opposite the Maury hotel, in fact, throughout the entire city the devilish work went on, and gathering boldness from impunity, the mob began dashing kerosene upon the doors of houses, and endeavoring to imitate the Commune in all its horrors. It looked as though Lima were to become a second Moscow. The roar of the flames. the crack of the rifles, the yells of the mob formed a demoniac symphony whose deeper notes were the successive explosions of the forts and magazines of Callao where Capt. Astete, before fleeing himself, fired the fleet and blew up the fortifications, and where sack and pillage were in full blast.
